To whom it may concern,

I am writing this letter of recommendation in support of Jeremy George, a student who was in the clinical internship section that I facilitated during his last semester in the Master's Program in Counseling at Wake Forest University. Throughout his tenure in my semester-long course, Jeremy consistently juggled numerous responsibilities. In spite of competing demands, he predictably devoted time outside of sessions considering optimal interventions as well as appropriate advocacy efforts and resources available. He demonstrated enthusiasm for the opportunity to work with individuals with complex presenting concerns, and his site seemingly felt sufficiently confident in his skills to allow him to engage such complexities at this juncture in his career. His conceptual skills and knowledge of pertinent theory are above average, and he employs a range of helpful empirically validated interventions. Jeremy constantly looks for additional approaches to incorporate into sessions, not limited to bibliotherapy and film. His investment of time and energy between sessions is laudable and demonstrative of his desire to facilitate positive change in the lives of others.

I am certain that Jeremy's clients benefited from engagement with him and know that his student colleagues did as well. Jeremy was a reliable contributor to rich group discussions and peer reviews. His presence within the group elevated our clinical discussions, particularly those relating to therapeutic processes and transference. He will be a supportive colleague and a devoted clinician.

More than anything, I would like to comment on his passion for mental health and empowering humans striving for improved quality of life. This is a second career for Jeremy and one that he chose precisely on account of this passion. I am excited to learn about his next professional steps and to write in support of his candidacy.

Sincerely,
